

REFLECTION OF CHILDHOOD IN ADULTHOOD

This research article discusses the reflection of childhood in adulthood. Every adult had a childhood that they look at occasionally either terrible, amazing, or some in between. Childhood is a period of being a child with a lot of core memories. Besides that, it can reflect a person's life in many ways, for instance, the way they act with others, how they treat themselves and what they enjoy doing in their life. The main points this research will discuss are parents being supportive/ unsupportive, parents, attachment, and education.

Parents being supportive or unsupportive can affect a child's life in different ways. For example, actively encouraging them to do their best in school, and hobbies can lead to a healthy kind of love that a child should feel. Support, trust, and cheer from their family would make them feel safe and secure. More like they can have trust and can be independent on their own without feeling pressured or being disappointed in themselves. Also, they know that they are loved for who they are and that their parents are always there to support them no matter what. Research suggests children who get support from parents will achieve better academically (Chrysalis,1998). Additionally, this can affect their adulthood in a good way from being independent and feeling loved and trusted can make them successful in their life and they would feel good about themselves. Furthermore, unsupportive parents are the kind of toxic parents who tend to be unsupportive of their children's choices, interests, and accomplishments. Which can lead to the child feeling unworthy and having a feeling of low self-esteem this can be hurtful to the child and can cause problems in their adulthood. As proof adults who didn't have any support when they were kids nowadays, they tend to lack social skills and increase the chances of mood disorders such as depression (g u a r n o t t a ,2020).

REFLECTION OF CHILDHOOD IN ADULTHOOD

Attachment refers to a relationship bond between a child and their parents. This connection is made from the day a child is born it has an impact on a child's life from different aspects such as sense of development, growth, and future relationship with others. Furthermore, there are two types of attachments the first one is the secure attachment. In which parents have the physical and emotional closeness and finances to be responsible for a child's basic needs. Secure parents always gone make their children feel safe so that they can explore the world and be themselves knowing the fact that their parents got to trust in them. Also, they know that they are safe to try out different things without being judged. This would help affect their adulthood in a good way by feeling protected and safe that their caregiver will always be there to welcome them back and provide comfort in times of stress or anxiety. Moreover, we got the insecure attachment that develops from a negative interaction between the child and their caregiver. When a child's caregiver and the environment they live in are a source of fear rather than a source of safety and protection this can be highly toxic to a child's growth (Catherine, 2018). Furthermore, a disorder in the development of unsecured attachment could occur due to parents being busy, and they lack in giving attention to the child because of other life commitments. This can lead to the child having depression, and anxiety, and in adulthood, they would develop a lower ability to cope with stress and poor relationships with others.

REFLECTION OF CHILDHOOD IN ADULTHOOD

Finally, education introduces new ideas, skills, concepts, and opportunities for children to have a place where they can explore, experiment, and work confidently along with others. Child needs to have a good education while growing up it can impact their life as they get older learning also support child growth, development, and well-being. Plus, education can affect child learning in many ways, for example, in parents' education according to (Shaver and Walls,1998), students with high levels of parental involvement are better in reading and math than those with a low level of parental involvement. Furthermore, (Gonzalez-peinda et al,2002) identified that parental involvement makes a positive influence on the student's academic achievement by affecting their academic self-concept which is of considerable importance in academic success. Also, educated parents tend to invest more in them. children's education gets proper guidance from their educated parents. This leads to a successful life in adulthood because they get to learn from their parents first then school which can help them get high marks and understand quickly. On the other hand, children who got uneducated parents usually don't get much financial support unlike children of educated parents who get good financial support. Also, uneducated parents may not be able to assist their children with their education needs which can be a problem for the child. So, when children grow and become an adult, they will find it hard to do certain things because they weren't taught properly.

REFLECTION OF CHILDHOOD IN ADULTHOOD

This research discussed the Reflection of childhood on adulthood. Which is the effect of parents being supportive, unsupportive, and how it can impact childhood and adulthood. Two main attachments can lead to different kinds of affect first one was the secure attachment that can lead to a good healthy life for the child which affects their adulthood in a good way by feeling protected and safe. The second one was insecure attachment where the child can have depression, and anxiety, and in adulthood, they would develop a lower ability to cope with stress and poor relationships with others because the parents didn't give the child enough attention and they were busy with their other life commitments. Lastly, we have an education that plays a huge part in childhood. There are two sides to education firstly educated parents who have high levels of parental and their children are better in reading and math than those with a low level of parental involvement which is the uneducated parents.